Friends travel huge distances to pay respects to much-loved couple

by Rodney Edwards

THEY touched countless lives with their kindness, wisdom, selflessness and enthusiasm to help others.

Combined with their devotion to one and other, Bill and Anne Barbour were loved and adored by many.

And when the couple tragically died last year their sad passing sent shock waves around the county.

Anne Barbour, suffering from the advanced stages of Alzheimer's disease, was found dead at the family home on the Sligo Road in Enniskillen.

A postmortem found she had died from suffocation. The body of her husband Bill, a former teacher at Portora Royal School, was recovered from Rossole Lough. He had drowned himself.

After their deaths it was learnt that the couple had an agreement to end their lives if Mrs. Barbour's Alzheimer's disease got "too degrading".

And as their poignant last picture (kindly donated by their family) shows, the couple were together to the very end.

After their private funeral at Roselawn Crematorium in Belfast in November, their family sought ways to hold some sort of public event to allow those that knew them well the opportunity to pay their own respects.

And so a fitting celebration of Bill and Anne's lives took place at the Erne Integrated College in Enniskillen at the weekend, arranged by principal (and Bill's former pupil) Tom Noble.

"Friends of Anne and Bill have travelled huge distances from places like Cork, Scotland and England. I welcome the many who have come from so many professional, civic, educational and political backgrounds. We are here to celebrate the lives of two very special people who we all love and whose lives have inspired all of us in so many unique ways," he said.

Bill, a firm supporter of integrated education worked tirelessly with others to secure such an establishment in Enniskillen.

"He once told me about an unannounced visit he made to the Ulster Bank in Donegal Square in Belfast in 1993. He asked for the manager and said: "I'd like to borrow £4 million pounds to set up a new integrated school in Enniskillen." So then a somewhat bemused manager said: "Let's go out for lunch." While Bill didn't go away with the cash in his pocket, he certainly paved the way in negotiating a series of bank loans which enabled this school to become established," said Mr. Noble.

John Maxwell joined Bill in campaigning for the introduction of an integrated movement in Fermanagh.

"After the Remembrance Day bomb in Enniskillen in 1987, a group called Enniskillen Together was formed, whose aim was to try and bridge the political and religious divide. A sub committee was formed to examine the possibility of developing an integrated education sector as part of the education system in Fermanagh. Bill was an enthusiastic member of this group," he said.

Mr. Maxwell also recounted a humorous tale while a student at Portora Royal School.

"I have a particular memory of a certain rugby match when Bill was tended to referee. These house matches often proved to be bad tempered, somewhat vicious affairs and this one was no different. At one point a fight broke out among the forwards in a ruck, followed by a shout: "For God's sake get off me or I'll*" - more profanity which I'll not repeat. Thereupon there was a very loud blast on a whistle, followed by complete silence while we waited to see what Bill would do - and expecting at the very least to be severely reprimanded. After a pause which seemed to go on forever, Bill said very quietly "I'm afraid the Lord cannot be much help to you in this situation." Both teams dissolved in laughter and a potentially difficult situation was diffused. This was typical of Bill's way of handling difficulties and I learnt a lesson that day," he laughed.

Other tributes came from Mr. Barbour's former colleagues. Robert Northridge, deputy principal at Portora Royal School, Billy Dickson, chairman of the Fermanagh branch of the Royal British Legion and Alliance party member Eric Bullick.

Bringing the service to a close, the couple's eldest son James explained how he and his family were overwhelmed by the shock and the suddenness of their deaths. Looking back at their lives, Mr. Barbour said he thought his parents were "immensely fortunate".

"Their views on several matters were not widely shared in Enniskillen but people made space for them, and respected their hard work and good intentions, and agreed to differ. They had many friends and did not seem to make enemies. And they loved the setting in which they lived themselves; the countryside of Fermanagh. On foot, on bicycles, by car and by rowing boat, their delight was exploring Fermanagh's wild places, and they passed that delight on to us, their children," he said.

Forty-seven years ago, Bill bought the old National School at Topped Mountain Lough and gradually rehabilitated it as a dwelling.

"He and mother dreamed of moving to live there year round, but in the end did not do so. Possibly there was some early intimation of Mother's Alzheimer's disease - and many years into retirement, they eventually sold the property," explained James.

"Mother's Alzheimer's disease progressed slowly but relentlessly, and as the years went by, she lost the ability to converse sensibly. But they continued in great companionship because of their love of the open air, and they worked away steadily at their garden, and walked daily, except in the worst weather.

"Mother's progressive loss of mental capacity was a heavy and increasing burden, but for a very long time they were able to adapt their lives so that they could still be happy. Their love and guidance is treasured by four children and ten grandchildren. They had the privilege of rearing their family in what still seems to me close to the best possible setting for doing this. The community around them accepted them, and they in turn served that community, and things they did have helped to strengthen it and make it better able to face the future. And they were able to live independently and privately as a couple till their very last evening. They are much missed, but theirs were full lives, lives to be celebrated," he said.

Holocaust survivors will share stories

ENNISKILLEN Castle Museums are holding a series of talks for schools and the general public in January, linking with the international Holocaust Memorial Day 2010. Two Holocaust Survivors, Eva Clarke and Joanna Millan have been invited to Enniskillen Castle to talk about their own very moving personal testimonies. The theme of Holocaust Memorial Day 2010 is "The Legacy of Hope".

Holocaust Memorial Day - January 27, 2010 - marks the 65th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camp, Auschwitz-Birkenau. Holocaust Memorial Day 2010 offers an opportunity to listen to the voices from the Holocaust and Nazi persecution.

Eva Clarke was born in Mauthausen Concentration Camp, Austria, on 29th April 1945. She tells the remarkable story of how she and her mother survived - the only two members of her immediate family to do so. Joanna Millan was born Bela Rosenthal in August 1942 in Berlin. Despite all the odds stacked against her, she managed to survive as an orphaned toddler in Theresienstadt, a concentration camp 50 miles outside Prague.

Eva Clarke highlights the importance of holding these talks: "When I tell my story to others, what I try to do is not only remember and commemorate all those people who died, but also try to educate about the lessons of the Holocaust. It's important to teach about respecting the individual from a very early age, to create a legacy of hope for the future".

The following events will be taking place:

Tuesday 19 January Eva Clarke Holocaust Survivor. Time: 1pm (Schools programme)

Tuesday 19 January Eva Clarke Holocaust Survivor. Time: 7pm (Public programme)

Wednesday 20 January Eva Clarke Holocaust Survivor. Time: 10am (Schools Programme)

Tuesday 26 January Joanna Millan Holocaust Survivor. Time: 1pm (Schools programme)

Tuesday 26 January Joanna Millan Holocaust Survivor. Time: 7pm (Public programme)

Wednesday 27 January Joanna Millan Holocaust Survivor. Time: 10am (Schools programme)

Prior booking is essential. Please contact Museum Reception for details on 028 6632 5000 from NI. The talks have been organised in conjunction with the Holocaust Educational Trust, with funding from the Community Relations Unit (OFMDM) and Fermanagh District Council.
